Mutant Homecoming

A sentient landmass, Krakoa was born when a violent schism tore apart mutantkind's first and only homeland. Its symbiotic connection to Earth's mutant population completely severed, the island spent centuries adrift in pain and confusion. In modern times, however, the mutants returned, bringing with them renewed hope for the future.

Ego

The Living Planet

Of all the worlds in the universe, perhaps the strangest is Ego—a planet controlled by a single consciousness. Dwelling in the Black Galaxy—a living bio-verses bordering the Rigellian Empire—Ego has, on occasion, ventured out into the wider cosmos, and, just as often, the denizens of that cosmos have invaded the Living Planet's domain, much to his displeasure.

Ego was originally Ego, a scientist on a planet in the Black Galaxy. Eons ago, the cosmic entity the Stranger visited Ego's homeworld and began conducting an experiment, causing the star around which the planet orbited to go nova. Together, Ego and another scientist, Chitu, came up with a way of saving the planet's people: Project Workflows. The entire population was placed in suspended animation and projected into the center of the planet, with the aim that they would be able to return to the surface once the sun had cooled again. In the event, the star exploded sooner than expected, and Ego was unable to reach the planet's core. He was stranded not only with the world but also with the two billion men and women at its center, becoming Ego, the Living Planet.

Two become one
When the star of his homeworld went nova, Ego and the planet were bathed in radiation, merging together. Thor #208, Oct. 1974.

A powerful planet
Ego possessed destructive psychic abilities and could replenish his powers by accessing stars or other energy sources. Ultimates 2 #6, Aug. 2017
